Next Education Matters explores how Kentucky serves adult learners

More than 785,000 Kentucky adults have never received a high school diploma, putting them at higher risk for unemployment and poverty. The next Education Matters explores how the state is helping these Kentuckians overcome learning obstacles, earn GED credentials and move on to higher education and the workplace in "Serving Kentucky's Adult Learners," airing Tuesday, Feb. 22 at 9/8 p.m. CT on KET.

Host Bill Goodman discusses these issues with Cris Crowley, director of the Madisonville Community College adult education program; Cheryl King, president of Kentucky Wesleyan College; Reecie Stagnolia, vice president, Kentucky Adult Education; and James Meyer, a U of L student who earned his GED credential in 2005.

The program also features a video visit to the adult education center in Mason County to learn first-hand about the resources available to meet the educational needs of older students.
